

Return of the Victor Murk

FROM NISHANT CREATIONS

Warning & Reader Agreement

This agreement serves as a formal acknowledgment that the reader is voluntarily choosing to engage with this book, which contains graphic depictions of violence, torture, and extreme cruelty. The content within these pages is disturbing and may cause emotional distress.

Terms of Agreement:

- A. Understanding the content: The reader acknowledges that this book contains graphic descriptions of physical and psychological torture, Scenes of extreme violence and murder, and Psychological manipulation and trauma.
- B. Voluntarily Participation: By proceeding with this book, the reader confirms they are doing so at their own risk, fully aware of the dark and disturbing nature of its content.
- C. Personal Responsibility: The author and publisher hold no liability for any psychological distress, emotional discomfort, or nightmares that may result from reading this book.
- D. Suitability Disclaimer: This book is not suitable for readers who are sensitive to extreme violence, cruelty, or psychological horror. If you choose to continue reading, you accept full responsibility for any impact it may have on you.
- E. Irrevocable Agreement: By continuing past this page, the reader agrees that they have been adequately warned, understand the risks, and accept full responsibility for engaging with the content.

By reading further, you are signing this agreement and confirming that you are signing this agreement and confirming that you are aware of the risks and proceeding at your own discretion.

You have been warned.

Copyright © 2026

All rights reserved.

No part of this book, Return of the Victor Murk, may be reproduced, distributing, transmitted, or sold in any form or by any means, including photocopying, recording, or other electronic or mechanical methods, without the prior written permission of the author. Unauthorised use, duplication, or sale of this material is strictly prohibited and may result in legal action.

For permissions or inquiries, please contact the author directly.

Version - Raw

Edition - First

Author - Nishant

Preface

If you believed the first descent into the shadows was the limit of human endurance, you were mistaken.

The threshold of the chamber has been crossed, and the door has been sealed behind you. In The Chamber of The Murk, we explored the anatomy of fear; in Return of the Victor Murk, we witness the total eradication of the soul. This is no longer just a descent — it is an immersion into a refined, systematic cruelty that pushes the boundaries of the “human” until the term itself becomes unrecognisable.

As the author, I must offer a more urgent warning for this second chapter of the series. While the first instalment introduced the darkness, this volume accelerates it tenfold. Here, the violence is not merely consumed by darkness—we are watching that darkness evolve, sharpen, and claim its victory over every remaining shred of morality.

The “Victor Murk” does not seek to break his victims; he seeks to reconstruct them within his own distorted reality. The level of suffering depicted in these pages teeters on the razor’s edge of psychopathic behaviour—just beneath the absolute clinical threshold—making it all the more terrifying because it remains, however hauntingly, within the realm of possibility.

Prepare yourself. The stakes are higher, the methods are more harrowing, and the “entertainment” is far more costly. You are no longer a guest in the chamber; you are a witness to the aftermath of total psychological collapse.

Enter again, if you have the stomach for it. But remember: the first part was a warning. This part is the consequences.

Acknowledgement

Writing a sequel that delves ten times deeper into the abyss than its predecessor is a taxing journey, and it is not one I traveled alone.

First and foremost, I must acknowledge the readers. To those who survived the first chamber and demanded more: your appetite for the unflinching and the macabre provided the fuel necessary to push this narrative into even darker territory. This book exists because you were brave enough to stare into the murk alongside me.

I am deeply grateful to my research consultants and editors, who helped me navigate the thin, harrowing line between fiction and the visceral reality of the human psyche. Your feedback in a terrifying sense of possibility. You helped me sharpen the “victor” into the formidable force he has become.

To my inner circle, thank you for providing a sanctuary of light while I spent months immersed in this dark manuscript. It is your support and grounding presence that allowed me to explore the “just-below-psychopathic” depths of the human mind without losing my own way.

Finally, I acknowledge the nature of the human spirit. Even in a story defined by its absence, it is the memory of what is “human” that gives the darkness its depth.

Thank you for stepping back into the chamber.

RAW VERSION

(Read it on your own risk)

ROOM 001D

The air in the room did not circulate. It was thick, heavy with the metallic tang of old blood and the sharp, clinical sting of industrial bleach. This was a place where time died — a windowless concrete box buried so deep beneath the earth that the vibrations of the world above were nothing more than a forgotten memory.

In the centre of the room, suspended from a rusted steel winch bolted into the ceiling, was Elena Dawson.

She was stripped of everything—her clothes, her dignity, and her hope. Her body was forced into a gruelling, unnatural position. Her wrists were bound with heavy iron chains that bit into limbs together in a tight, agonising arc. She hung like a piece of livestock in a slaughterhouse, her toes barely scraping the cold, damp floor. Every time she tried to shift her weight to relieve the pressure on her spine, the chains groaned, and the meat of her wrists tore a little further.

Elena's breath came in ragged, shallow hitched. Her hair, once a vibrant chestnut, was now a matted, sweaty veil over her face. She had lost track of how many days she had been in the dark. Hunger was a dull ache, but the thirst was a screaming demon in her throat.

Then, the sound came.

Click. Clack. Click. Clack.

Hard-soled boots against concrete. The sound was rhythmic, devoid of haste. It was the sound of a man who owned the space he inhabited.

The heavy steel door at the end of the corridor grained on its hinges. A silver of pale, artificial light cut through the gloom, stretching across the floor like a skeletal finger. As the door opened wider, a tall silhouette filled the frame.

He stepped inside and clicked the light switch. A single, high-intensity bulb hummed to life overhead, casting harsh, unforgiving shadows.

"Welcome," the man said. His voice was smooth baritone, as calm as a priest's at vespers. "To the Room of God."

Elena squinted against the sudden glare, her eyes stinging. She looked up, her vision blurring. The man stood before her, clad in a pristine, dark suit that seemed out of place in this filth. Over his face, he wore a mask—a featureless, porcelain white visage that looked like a frozen scream.

He walked around her slowly, inspecting her like a piece of art. He didn't speak for a long time, enjoying the sound of her frantic, panicked breathing.

"Do you know why I call it that, Elena?" he asked, stopping in front of her. "In the world outside, people pray to a God they cannot see, hoping for a mercy that never arrives. But in this room, the hierarchy is clear. I am the one who decides when you breathe. I am the one who decides when you bleed. I am the only power that matters here."

Elena's voice was a cracked whisper. "Please... let me go. I have... I have nothing."

The man chuckled. It was a dry, hollow sound. "You have your life, Elena. And for a man like me, that is the most precious currency in existence."

He reached up, his gloved fingers grazing the edge of the porcelain mask. With a slow, deliberate motion, he unhooked the straps. The mask came away, revealing the face beneath.

Elena's heart stopped. The blood drained from her face, leaving her a ghostly shade of grey. She knew that face. She had seen it at dinner parties; she had seen it in the background of old photographs from her husband's time on the force. This was a man who had stood at the funeral of her late husband, Inspector Jack Dawson. He had offered her his hand in sympathy. He had offered her words of comfort.

"You?" she gasped, her voice trembling with a new, sharper kind of terror. "It's you? Why... why are you doing this? You were Jack's friend. You're a man of the law!"

The man, Victor Murk, smiled. It wasn't the smile of a madman; it was the smile of a technician who had just found the perfect tool for a job.

"Friendship is a mask we wear to navigate the dullness of society," Victor said, stepping closer until she could smell the peppermint on his breath. "And the law is merely a set of rules for those too weak to create their own. As for 'why'..."

He leaned in, his eyes wide and sparking with an intense, terrifying clarity.

"I do this because I love it, Elena. I enjoy the architecture of pain. I love the way the human spirit tries to cling to its dignity even as the body is being dismantled. I love to hear them scream—not the scream of anger, but the scream of pure, unadulterated realisation. I love the way they cry when they realise that no one is coming to save them."

He straightened his tie, his movements graceful. "Giving people like you severe, transformative pain... it gives me a relief that nothing else can. It is my meditation. My art."

Victor turned toward a small rolling cart draped in a white cloth. He pulled the cloth away to reveal a shimmering array of stainless steel instruments. There were scalpels, clamps, saws, and needles, all arranged with obsessive precision.

He bypassed the blades and reached for a heavy pair of industrial pliers. The steel was cold and dull, the serrated teeth of the tool designed for gripping and tearing.

He turned back to Elena. The look in his eyes was one of pure, predatory focus.

"Jack always said you were a woman of great strength," Victor whispered, stepping into her personal space. "Let's see how much of that strength is left when the flesh begins to fail."

Elena began to thrash in her chains, the metal links clashing and ringing out a frantic, hopeless rhythm. "No! No, please! God, please stop!"

"I told you, Elena," Victor said softly, his hand reaching out to steady her swaying body. "I am the only God in this room."

He moved with agonising slowness. He took the pliers and brought them toward her breast. Elena's eyes went wide, the pupils shrinking to pinpricks as the cold metal touched her skin. The contrast of the freezing steel against her feverish flesh made her gasp.

Victor positioned the teeth of the pliers. He didn't rush. He wanted her to feel every micro-adjustment. He wanted her to anticipate the sensation, to let the fear bloom in her mind until it was more painful than the act itself.

"The human body is so resilient," he mused, his voice dropping to a low, intimate hum. "But it has such delicate points of failure."

He tightened his grip on the handles.

"No!" she shrieked, a sound that tore through the silence of the room.

Victor didn't flinch. He didn't blink. With a sudden, violent jerk of his wrist, he clenched the pliers and snatched the tool backward.

The sound that followed was sickening—a wet, tearing noise, like heavy fabric being ripped apart.

Elena's scream was no longer human. It was a high-pitched, vibrating wail of total agony that hit the concrete walls and bounced back, filling the room until it seemed the very air would shatter. Her body convulsed, her spine snapping into a rigid bow as the nervous system went into a state of total shock.

Victor stepped back, looking down at the tool in his hand. A small, bloody fragment of flesh remained caught in the teeth of the pliers. He looked at it with the detached curiosity of a scientist.

A dark, hot crimson began to blossom across Elena's chest, trailing down her stomach and dripping onto the floor. Drip. Drip. Drip.

Victor smiled again, a genuine, peaceful expression.

"Nice trailer," he whispered, as the echoes of her scream finally began to fade into a broken, rhythmic sobbing. "We have so much further to go, Elena. This is only the preface of your end."

The heavy steel door of the Room of God hissed shut, sealing Elena Dawson's broken whimpers behind a foot of reinforced lead and concrete. Victor Murk stood in the corridor, the silence of the hallway rushing in to meet him like a cold tide.

The transition was instantaneous. The man who had just performed a grotesque act of mutilation did not tremble; his pulse did not quicken.

Instead, he reached up to his hairline. His fingers, still stained with the dark, copper-scented spray of Elena's blood, found the nearly invisible seam of medical-grade adhesive.

With a slow, peeling sound—like a bandage being pulled from a wound—he began to remove the face of the man the world knew as a friend.

The silicone mask came away in a single, wet piece. The features of the man who had comforted widows and shaken hands with police commissioners slumped in his hand, a hollowed-out husk of humanity. Underneath, Victor's real face emerged.

It was a face that was terrifyingly unremarkable. It was a face that belonged nowhere and everywhere. His skin was pale, his features symmetrical and cold, his eyes two voids that seemed to swallow the light of the hallway. This was his greatest weapon: the ability to be a ghost. He kept the mask of Jack Dawson's friend not out of sentiment, but as a strategic insurance policy. Should the authorities ever breach the upper levels of his sanctuary, they would be looking for a man who didn't exist, a ghost wearing a dead friend's smile.

He dropped the mask into a sterilised tray and wiped his face with a damp cloth. He didn't look in the mirror to check his appearance; he didn't need to. He knew exactly who he was.

He turned and walked deeper into the sub-structure. The hallway here was different. The walls were lined with monitors displaying the vitals of his various "projects." He passed the sensors and stopped in front of a door marked with a simple, etched symbol: 001D.

This was the room of Clara.

Clara had been the first. She was the one who had disappeared from the streets of Dreadmoor City months ago, sparking a frantic search that had eventually grown cold. To the world, she was a missing person's poster fading under the rain. To Victor, she was the foundation of his new empire of pain.

The door slid open with a mechanical hum.

The air in this chamber smelled of antiseptic and decay. In the centre of the room stood the "Mechanical Chair"—a nightmare of engineering. It was a throne of polished steel and black leather, equipped with hydraulic pistons and micro-adjustable restraints. It was designed to keep the human body in a state of absolute, motionless vulnerability.

Clara sat in the chair, her body held upright by a series of thin, titanium wires that prevented her head from drooping. She was naked, but the vulnerability of her skin was overshadowed by the devastation of her extremities.

Her hands, once capable of playing the piano or holding a pen, were now blunt, mangled stumps. Victor had spent weeks on her "refinement." Her fingernails and toenails had been removed with surgical precision, followed by the systematic amputation of each finger and toe, joint by joint.

She was alive—the machines humming beside her ensured that—but the girl named Clara was gone. Her eyes were open, staring at the far wall with a thousand-yard stare that saw nothing. Her spirit had been ground into dust long ago.

Victor approached her, his footsteps silent on the padded floor. He didn't wear a mask here. Clara was the only one who knew his true face, and that was a privilege she had paid for in blood.

"Clara," he whispered, leaning down so his lips were inches from her ear. "Did you hear the music from the next room? Elena was very loud today. She has a certain... vibrato... that you lacked."

Clara's pupils didn't even flicker. She was a shell, a biological machine waiting for the next input of pain.

"But don't feel jealous, baby," Victor said, his voice dripping with a sickening, paternal warmth. "I haven't forgotten about you. In fact, I've been saving a very special sensation just for this afternoon."

He walked around the chair, his eyes roaming over her scarred upper arm. The skin there was pale and stretched tight over the muscle.

Victor didn't reach for a tool this time. He didn't want the cold intervention of steel. He wanted something more intimate, something that would bridge the gap between the predator and the prey.

He leaned in, his breath hot against her shoulder. His jaw unhinged slightly, his teeth baring in the harsh LED light.

"I want to feel you," he murmured.

With a sudden, animalistic snap, Victor lunged. He sank his teeth into the soft meat of her upper arm, his jaw locking with terrifying strength.

The reaction was instantaneous. The "life" that had seemed absent from Clara's body surged back in a frantic, agonising burst. Her body strained against the titanium wires, her muscles seizing as a muffled, guttural scream tore from her throat.

Victor didn't let go. He shook his head slightly, tearing at the fibres of the muscle, his eyes wide and rolling with a dark, ecstatic pleasure. He tasted the salt, the copper, the raw essence of her suffering.

With a final, violent yank, he pulled away. A ragged piece of flesh was clamped between his teeth.

He stood upright, swallowing the small piece of her as if it were a communion wafer. Blood smeared his lips and chin, dripping onto his pristine white shirt, but he didn't care. The rush of dopamine hitting his brain was more powerful than any drug. It was the feeling of total, absolute consumption.

Clara's scream trailed off into a series of wet, choking gasps. Her body slumped back into the mechanical chair, the wires groaning under the weight of her collapse.

Victor wiped the blood from his mouth with the back of his hand, a look of profound peace settling over his features. He looked at the cameras mounted in the corners of the room, speaking to the silent observers of his own mind.

"The world thinks it knows what evil is," he said, his voice resonant and powerful. "They think it's a shadow in an alleyway. They think it's a monster in a storybook. They are wrong."

He stepped toward the centre of the room, spreading his arms wide as if embracing the very air of the chamber.

"Evil is not a shadow. Evil is a choice. It is the ultimate expression of freedom. To take, to break, to own another soul entirely... that is the only true power."

He looked back at Clara, who was shivering in the grip of shock.

"I am the architect of the new world. I am the silence in the scream. I am the GOD of this domain."

He turned toward the door, his silhouette tall and imposing against the clinical light.

"I am Victor Murk."

The lights in the chamber flickered and then dimmed to a deep, blood-red glow as the door slid shut, leaving the "First Project" alone in the dark.

chapters

- ROOM 001D
 - 1. The Investigation
 - 2. Murk Anamnesis Project
 - 3. Victoria's Disappearance
 - 4. Corrigan's Past
 - 5. Morgan's Family
 - 6. John's Body
 - 7. Dreadmoor is in danger
- Where is Chandler?

The Investigation

Murk Anamnesis Project

Victoria's Disappearance

Corrigan's Past

Morgan's Family

John's Body

Dreadmoor is in Danger

Where is Chandler?